The City of Norfolk Water Pollution Control staff has won the Scott Wilbur Award from the Nebraska Water Environment Association for the 10th year in a row.

The award recognizes well-operated and maintained facilities within the state for the category of one to five million gallons per day flow.

The WPC staff were also awarded a safety award for excellence in accident prevention and for the way they promote safety in their facilities with meetings, materials, programs safety upgrades. This is also the tenth year the staff has received a safety award.

The NWEA has been in existence for 62 years as a non-profit group of professionals dedicated to protecting Nebraska's water quality. Todd Boling, City of Norfolk Wastewater Plant Superintendent, accepted the award at the annual NWEA Conference held in Kearney the first week of November.
